For my own sanity, I created a script that enables keyboard navigation within truth tables, using the arrow keys (or, for nerds of one kind or another, wasd and hjkl). You play with a demonstration here:

The script is available here:

I've been using the script for a semester with my students without issues. It should improve accessibility, as far as I can tell. But it is possible that it interacts badly with other accessibility tools students might use for keyboard navigation.
